Egypt adopts a decent life initiative

It aims to alleviate the burdens of citizens in the neediest communities in the countryside and slums in urban areas. The initiative is based on implementing a set of service and development activities that will ensure a "decent life" for this category and improve their living conditions.

Egypt Human Development Report 2021: Placing people at the centre of the National Reform Program protected Egyptians' right to development.

Egypt has made progress toward comprehensive reform, prioritising economic advancement as a key driver of development while also putting Egyptians at the centre of the development process. According to Egypt's Human Development Report (HDR) 2021, titled "Development, a Right for All: Egypt's Pathways and Prospects," this preserved development gains for all Egyptians during a decade marked by significant changes in Egypt and major political and socioeconomic transformations. The United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) and Egypt's Ministry of Planning and Economic Development launched the report yesterday under the auspices of and in the presence of Egyptian President Abdel Fattah El-Sisi.

The Egypt Human Development Report 2021, titled 'Development, a Right for All:

Egypt's Pathways and Prospects tracks progress on various aspects of sustainable development. It bases its analyses on the 'Declaration on the Right to Development,' which was adopted by the United Nations General Assembly in 1986. The 2021 Report aims to provide an in-depth analysis of Egypt's pursuit of its national Sustainable Development Strategy: Egypt's Vision 2030, which is fully aligned with the Sustainable Development Goals of the 2030 Agenda (SDGs). The Report offers an analytical review of the policies that were adopted and implemented during this time, as well as their impact on Egyptians. Building on those findings and the Government Action Programme, it proposes a set of policies for the future that would accelerate Egypt's human development process.
